

Helicoprions

Talk about teeth! The cartoonish-looking Helicoprions roamed the oceans 270 million years ago. (Something tells me this fish was probably a meat-eater.) Scientists still can't agree on precisely how its menacing teeth were positioned or how it used them to capture prey. What's your best guess? How do you think Helicoprions wrangled its dinner?